TROUBLESHOOTER

Dear Lynn,

I understand your desire to cook, despite your parents' resistance. To convince them, it is important to address their concerns and communicate effectively.

Firstly, empathize with their worries about your safety. Assure them that you will prioritize precautions, such as wearing appropriate attire and handling utensils carefully. Offer to take cooking classes or watch tutorial videos to show your commitment to learning responsible cooking habits.

Second, highlight the educational and practical benefits of cooking. Explain that it is a valuable life skill, promoting healthier food choices and fostering creativity and problem-solving abilities.

Finally, involve your parents in the process by suggesting cooking together as a family. This allows them to witness your progress, share their culinary knowledge, and provide guidance and supervision. It also strengthens family ties.

Remember to communicate calmly and respectfully, listening to their concerns and addressing them. Present your case with a well-thought-out plan and emphasize the benefits. With perseverance and understanding, you can persuade your parents to support your passion for cooking.

Best of luck!

Sincerely,

Li Hua
